A man of contradictions, Carnegie was raised in poverty yet became the wealthiest man in America. Was he a self-made man or a heartless opportunist? Vicious union strike breaker or workers' rights advocate? Ruthless robber baron or world famous philanthropist? When he died in 1919 at age 83, Carnegie was worth $480 million ($310 billion today) and had donated $350 million for various causes: several public libraries, international peace, Carnegie Mellon University, Carnegie Hall, and Tuskegee Institute. Learn more about this legendary, controversial figure and what drove him to accumulate, then donate such a vast fortune.

Dan Rose has taught English for over 20 years to elementary, secondary, and college students in New England, NJ, and the UK. His poems have appeared in Alaska Quarterly, Lips, Portage, and U.S. 1 Worksheets. A poet, editor, and trainer, Dan Rose teaches and writes on a variety of subjects. He and his wife live in New Jersey with their dog Zoëy.

This program is sponsored by The Friends of the Pequannock Library.
