As World War I began, New Jersey supplied the Allies in Europe with both the products of its newfound industrial might as well as the sacrifices of its great citizens from Woodrow Wilson to Joyce Kilmer. In this lecture photojournalist Jim DelGiudice will discuss events from 100 years ago that still reverberate in our state today.

Jim is a lifetime Morris County resident who picked up a camera upon graduation from the Newhouse School in 1979 and has been documenting the local scene ever since. In April, 2016 his article, "Morristown, USA" appeared in American Spirit Magazine, the national journal of the DAR.

His architectural photography has appeared in several National Register nominations and he's been the primary photographer for two books about New Jersey architecture for Rutgers Press. These achievements have won him a share of the NJ Historic Preservation Award three times. In the millennium year he was cited by both the state and county legislatures for his lifetime contribution to the arts.

Jim has served variously as an adjunct at County College of Morris, Columbia University, Drew University, and New Jersey City University.
